Just when you think you are beginning to understand your kids, they come out and say something you would never expect.

That's what happened to me last week.

My four-year-old daughter came to me and asked, "Daddy, I'm bored. Can I play outside now?"

I was a bit worried about this because we had been renovating our veranda and there were still some left over nails and small pieces of timber lying around. But it was a lovely day for playing outside so I agreed.

"OK sweetie," I said. "But make sure you don't have bare feet."

Georgia looked carefully at her feet and wiggled her toes. Then she looked at me.

"But Daddy," she said. "I don't have bear feet. I have people feet."

I couldn't help but laugh. "So you do!" I agreed. "But, before you go outside, please put some shoes on."

It's times like this when I don't want Georgia to grow up. I enjoy not knowing what she's going to say next!
